Profile

Todd Mann is a senior policy advisor at Bose Public Affairs Group. In his role, he advises clients in the education realm, focusing on magnet schools and STEM programs.

In addition to his work with Bose Public Affairs Group, Mann serves as the executive director of Magnet Schools of America, where he developed the first certification program for magnet schools and secured a bipartisan funding increase for magnet schools. He also serves as the executive director of the National Consortium of Secondary STEM Schools, an association representing high schools that specialize in STEM approaches and outcomes.

Mann has also served as the CEO of his own association management firm, as a consultant to the United Nations and in senior management roles at Associated Builders and Contractors and the National Restaurant Association.

Education

Mann completed financial executive education at the Goizueta Business School at Emory University and is a graduate of Vassar College with a bachelor's degree in Russian studies.
